

The Last Lecture was inspiring to say the least. Pausch stated that everyone should chase their childhood dreams and this isn't something most people are being told in society. Often times childhood dreams are deemed silly and unrealistic but this lecture says otherwise. As a kid my childhood dream was to be in the NBA but I gave up on the dream when I was still 4'11 as a freshman. I completely gave up on my dream and quit practicing, but little did I know within the next 4 years I would grow to 6'6. If I would have continued chasing my childhood dream even when it seemed silly I might have been able to achieve my goal. As Pausch said in his lecture we will all face brick walls. In my life my "brick wall" was my height. I gave up on my dream because I faced this brick wall which I later broke down in life. Another thing he talked about was living life on a time crunch. We are not given our whole life to achieve these kind of dreams so we need to be working and practicing well we still can. Although my childhood dream is far behind me now this helped me identify my dream to work in the movie industry. I want to leave a legacy and go far with my dream. I am working on a time crunch and pursuing knowledge of media arts in college right now. I just have to keep going!
